Asian economies have achieved remarkable growth since last decade, making Asia as the global economic centre. This tremendous growth of Asian states has highlighted the potential of Asian economies in the increasingly integrated global economy. In today's modern era the connectivity has become the global trend, making major projects of inter-regional connectivity crucial for economic development and regional prosperity. In this regard China's proposed Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) is very crucial for global connectivity. The projects under BRI have become important for Central Asia-South Asia connectivity through CPEC in Pakistan, enhancing bi-lateral and multilateral relations, economic and strategic cooperation, domestic production and providing easy access to the new markets. China's aim to link South Asia with Central Asia through CPEC is geared towards fostering economic prosperity. To ensure peace and stability in the region, China prioritizes the development of neighbouring countries by investing in infrastructure. Economic development is seen as the effective means to alleviate adverse conditions and guarantee peace and security in the region. CPEC is not designed to instigate competition or rivalry; apparently, it is intended for peaceful coexistence. Consequently, all connectivity projects are gaining popularity because of CPEC. The increasing regional integration has the potential to bring positive transformations to the region, and infrastructural development will be a contributing factor in maintaining regional stability.
